Sask. marathons re-evaluating their security

Reaction to Boston bombings. Organizers of province's largest races say finish line usually a symbol of accomplishment, not tragedy

MORGAN MODJESKI
morgan.modjeski@metronews.ca

With the recent bombings at the Boston Marathon that killed three and injured more than 170, organizers of the province's largest marathons are re-examining their security policies.

"I think all race organizers, for races big and small across the country, are going to take a step back and think about what — if anything — can reasonably be done at their own races to keep our participants, our sponsors, our volunteers and our spectators secure," said Doug Russell, volunteer race director with the Saskatchewan Credit Unions Queen City Marathon.

He explained that as a result of the recent bombings, they'll be re-examining security measures at this year's race, scheduled for Sept. 8.

"We're going to be working and consulting with our partners, with the city, with the Wascana Centre Authority and the Regina city police, and just examine what can we do," said Russell.

Kim Ali, the race director with the Saskatchewan Marathon in Saskatoon, said they constantly review their safety policies and will be doing so right up until the 2013 event, scheduled for May 26.

"We continue to meet and gather new information right up until race day," said Ali. "So we'll continue to re-evaluate what we do and look at it through different lenses."

Both Russell and Ali said although they were shocked and saddened by the recent Boston bombings, they're confident runners in each city will continue to pursue the sport.

Focus on vigilance

"Everyone will work hard to make sure the protocols that we follow are at the highest event standards for activities like this."

Carving ridings

Independent commissioner denigrated Sask. riding-boundary process: Tory

A Conservative MP says a member of the Saskatchewan electoral-boundary commission denigrated the process and should have recused himself.

Maurice Vellacott echoed the views of other MPs from the province who feel the commission's redrawing of the electoral map was based on a predetermined mindset.

The independent commission has proposed making exclusively urban ridings for Saskatoon and Regina, as opposed to the existing hybrids that include suburban and rural communities.

Drivers-ed programs expand to students in reserve schools

The Saskatchewan government is giving the green light to drivers-education programs for students who go to schools on reserves.

Driver training is offered by some First Nations high schools, but not all.

A report released Monday said that not being able to drive hurts the ability of First Nations and Métis people to get jobs.

The province says increasing access to driver education removes barriers to mobility and employment opportunities.

City gears up for a pothole blitz

Hit hard. The slow spring melt coupled with frigid nighttime temperatures have caused the city's aging roadways to develop a large number of craters

Work crews fill a pothole on 1st Avenue North as part of the 2013 spring pothole blitz, which could see the city spending over half a million dollars more than budgeted. MORGAN MODJESKI/METRO

Less than a week after Saskatoon launched its 2013 pothole season, city officials are already bracing for an extremely busy and expensive spring.

"We're about double the horsepower we are normally allotted in the budget, just to deal with the problem," said Mike Gutek.

According to Gutek, the month-long and "aggressive" pothole blitz will see up to 17 work crews patching and repairing potholes along the city's major arteries and bus routes at the added cost of $500,000 or more to the $1.2 million already budgeted.

"This is no different than having a snowstorm. We budget for a reasonable amount of work and then we roll with the punches," said Gutek.

The slow spring melt coupled with below zero nighttime temperatures have caused the city's aging roadways to develop a large number of craters, divots and dips. Work crews can patch and fill minor areas but will have to wait until the ground is thawed to tackle areas with large clusters of potholes.

"We just physically can't pave — it would be a complete waste of money — until we get the right conditions," said Gutek. "We're doing everything we can … we're working overtime and we've brought in additional crews."

The spring pothole blitz will focus on priority streets only, but the city plans on tackling potholes in residential neighbourhoods when the summer pothole blitz begins.

Three dead

Identifying the victims

An eight-year-old boy and a 29-year-old woman have been identified as two of the three casualties of the bombing.

Martin Richard

Martin Richard, a Grade 3 student from the Boston suburb of Dorchester, was with his parents Bill and Denise, his younger sister Jane, a Grade 1 student, and older brother Henry. Jane lost a leg to the attack, Congressman Stephen Lynch told Torstar News Service. Denise suffered severe head injuries, he said.

Police have closed off several city blocks around the Richard family home.

Krystle Campbell

Also identified on Tuesday was Krystle Campbell, of Medford, Mass., who worked at a restaurant in nearby Arlington. She was at the marathon with her father and her best friend.

William Campbell said his daughter was a "very caring, very loving person and was daddy's little girl." He said her friend was seriously injured.

Boston University said in a statement that a graduate student was the third victim, but held the name pending permission from the family.

The Chinese Consulate in New York said a Chinese national was the third person killed and that another was injured. Official news agency Xinhua reported that relatives have requested that the deceased not be identified.

Bombs likely made of pressure cookers: FBI

Boston Marathon. Such devices are often used abroad, and guides are available online

The bombs that ripped through the Boston Marathon crowd appear to have been fashioned out of ordinary pressure cookers, packed with shrapnel and then hidden in duffel bags, investigators said Tuesday.

Scores of victims remained in Boston hospitals, many with grievous injuries, a day after the twin explosions killed three people, wounded more than 170 and reawakened fears of terrorism in the U.S.

A nine-year-old girl and 10-year-old boy were among 17 victims listed in critical condition.

At a news conference, FBI agent Richard DesLauriers confirmed that investigators found pieces of black nylon from a bag or backpack and fragments of ball bearings and nails.

He said the range of suspects and motives was "wide open."

FBI agents searched an apartment in the Boston suburb of Revere. According to one law enforcement official, the tenant had been tackled as he ran from the scene of the explosions. But the man may simply have been fleeing from danger, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Pressure-cooker explosives have been used in Afghanistan, India, Nepal and Pakistan, according to a 2010 report by the FBI and Homeland Security. One of the devices used in the May 2010 Times Square attempted bombing was a pressure cooker, the report said.

Such devices have been recommended for lone-wolf operatives by al-Qaida. But guides on the bombs are readily found online, and officials said Americans should not rush to link the attack to overseas terrorists.

Investigators said they have not yet determined what was used to set off the explosives.

'Massive'. Quake in Pakistan and Iran kills dozens

An earthquake toppled homes on both sides of the Iran-Pakistan border Tuesday, killing dozens of people and causing skyscrapers to sway in Dubai.

It also forced Iranian officials — for the second time in less than a week — to assure the world that its main nuclear reactor wasn't damaged.

At least 34 people were killed in a single village in Pakistan, a military official said. Iran issued conflicting reports; its state-run Press TV called the quake 'massive' and cited 40 deaths before retracting that number. Other outlets mentioned no deaths.

The apparent backtracking in the Iranian reports could not be immediately explained, but authorities could be seeking to downplay casualties. The Tehran Geophysics Center said the quake measured at least magnitude 7.7, the strongest in more than 50 years.

Iran's nuclear chief Fereidoun Abbasi said there was no damage to the Bushehr reactor and invited UN inspectors to visit, twhe semiofficial ISNA news agency reported. Abbasi repeated the statement issued after last week's quake: the Bushehr reactor was built to withstand quakes up to magnitude 8.

On the Pakistani side, a military official said another 80 people were injured. Up to 1,000 mud homes were damaged, Pakistan Television added.

A Pakistani policeman, Azmatullah Regi, said nearly three dozen homes and shops collapsed in one village in the Mashkel area, which was the hardest hit by the quake. Rescue workers pulled the bodies of a couple and their three children, ages five to 15, from the rubble of one house, he said.

Alleged G20 hooligan surrenders to Toronto police

Toronto police have charged a 27-year-old New York City man with 26 offences arising from the G20 Summit in Toronto in June 2010.

Investigators say Joel Saleem Bitar returned to Canada from the United States voluntarily and surrendered to police on Tuesday.

Bitar — who was wanted on a Canada-wide warrant for G20-related offences — is being held in custody pending a court appearance on Wednesday.

Police allege Bitar used a hammer to smash the windows of a police car while an officer was inside the vehicle and vandalized windows of numerous downtown banks and shops.

He's also alleged to have thrown a rock at a line of police officers and smashed the window of a police minivan, causing property damage totalling more than $400,000.

Bitar faces charges including 13 counts of mischief over $5,000, two counts of intimidation of a justice system participant by violence and five counts of mischief endangering life. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Up in smoke. Smoking in the home sharply reduces real estate value: Survey

Homeowners risk coughing up big bucks if they're also smokers, according to a survey of Ontario real estate agents and brokers.

The survey found that smoking in the home can reduce the value of the property on resale by up to 29 per cent.

The study was sponsored by Pfizer Canada, a pharmaceutical company whose products include a smoking-cessation medication. It estimates a potential loss of up to $107,000 on a home in Ontario, where the average price is currently around $369,000.

The study found that an overwhelming majority of 401 real estate agents and brokers in the survey agreed that it is more difficult to sell a home where owners have smoked.

More than half of respondents — 56 per cent — said most buyers are less likely to purchase a home where people have smoked, and 27 per cent said most are unwilling to buy a home where people have smoked. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Ethiopia fights climate change

Addis Ababa. Climate changes have been hard on the economy, so local government has devised a plan of defence

ELISABETH BRAW
Metro World News

"Climate change is not a secondary issue for us, it's the primary one!" exclaims Haileselassie Sebehatu Hailu, manager of Addis Ababa's Environmental Protection Agency, as we meet in one of the municipal offices.

Even though Addis is located at a high altitude, temperatures are rising. Indeed, Ethiopia, a desperately poor nation, is one of the countries worst affected by climate change.

Coffee death

According to a new study by scientists at Britain's Royal Botanic Gardens, climate change means that by 2080 Ethiopian farmers may not be able to grow the country's famous Arabica bean. Coffee-growing countries in Central America stand to lose their coffee too.

"(Farmers) used to predict the weather by watching birds migrate and leaves change. Now people don't know when to plant, and they don't have other assets, so they can't buy food if their crops fail," reports Cathy Riley, Ethiopia Country Manager for Christian Aid.

To fight climate-change doom, the government has focused on getting Ethiopians to go green.

Collecting and reducing waste is seen as key, says Haileselassie (Ethiopians go by their first names).

The government is teaching farmers irrigation horticulture, which makes them less dependent on rain.

"Despite our small road coverage, we have a huge number of cars and buses, and they pollute," says Haileselassie. "So we're building a rapid bus and light-rail system."

Labour shortage?

Job vacancies fall to record low

Statistics Canada said the total job vacancies for January, down by 22,000 from a year earlier, is the lowest since the agency began collecting data in March 2011.

There were 6.5 unemployed workers chasing each opening, that ratio was the second highest, only bettered during that initial month.

The fresh data seems to undercut arguments that Canada is facing a labour shortage. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Have you ever "borrowed" anything from a hotel room?

A nice fluffy bathrobe? A copy of Where Saskatoon? A souvenir hanger from the Hanoi Hilton?

Be honest now. A recent Hotels.com survey reveals that Canadians are among the most thieving hotel guests in the world, ranking 22nd of 29 on the honesty scale.

Kanadian kleptomaniacs are particularly partial to "magazines and books," while Americans, who are slightly less honest, can't help stuffing the spare towels and pillow slips into their luggage.

Of course, Scandinavians from Denmark and Norway are the most honest when they are on the road and no one is watching, ranking first and third respectively. Is there anything these people don't do better than us?

I'm not sure what this means, but travellers from Quebec are significantly more honest than the rest of Canadians, at least when it comes to leaving stuff in hotel rooms where it belongs. Vive le Québécois honnêtes!

But look, this is not as clear-cut as the survey would make it. Some thefts, such as brand new coffee makers and mugs, hair dryers, and (for shame) the Bible, are obvious high crimes, while some are misdemeanours.

You have to wonder about "magazines and books." Am I the only one who was under what now appears to be the mistaken impression that if it has a hard cover it stays in the room, but magazines were meant to go along on excursions, providing portable, up-to-date information about gallery openings and ptomaine-free restaurants?

Then there are the toiletries seductively arrayed on the bathroom counter: shampoo, conditioner, hand cream, body wash, and mouthwash. What's the etiquette honnête? Maybe Canadians, unlike those healthy, clear-thinking, progressive, (probably lying) Scandinavians, are just confused.

One easy way to deal with this is to imagine how you'd feel if your own house guests routinely walked off with the soap, the soap dish, and the toothpaste, not to mention the artwork, clock radio, towels and washcloths and bathrobes, all items regularly pilfered from hotel rooms.

You'd be fâché, for sure.

It's just good policy to leave the goodies, no matter how irresistible, where you found them. And now it's for a good cause. Many hotels are participating in a program called Clean the World, which sends leftover toiletries to developing nations.

I can't believe I just typed that sentence. The Global South may go to bed hungry, but at least it will go to bed smelling good. And you, honest Canadian, you did that.

Anyway: mitts off, and we hope you enjoy your stay.

Little Tramps mark Chaplin's birthday

Young supporters of the Charlie Circle, a Charlie Chaplin fan-club, participate in an annual parade to celebrate the birthday of Charlie Chaplin in Adipur, Gujarat state, India, on Tuesday.

Canes in hand and bowler hats firmly in place, dozens of Chaplin impersonators tramped through the streets of this small port town to celebrate the legendary comic actor and filmmaker.

Chaplin has an odd resonance in this industrial town. Surrounded by salt flats bordering the Thar desert, Adipur's only claim to fame is the annual parade — now in its 40th year — to honour the silent-era actor.

Skipping work for Chaplin flicks cost fan his job

"I watched all three shows of the film that day. The next day I was sacked from my job for taking the day off without informing the office.... I lost my job but I discovered Charlie Chaplin and I've stayed his fan ever since."

Ashok Aswani, founder of Charlie Circle, a club that has been celebrating Chaplin's birthday since 1973, recalling that he was on his way to work when he saw a poster of Charlie Chaplin dressed as a tramp at the local movie hall.

He decided to skip work that day, which he was fired for, but has stayed a Chaplin fan ever since. "Every Chaplin film has a message for the common man. It's a message that has relevance even today."

RE: Global Warming: When It's Hot, We're Believers, But in the Cold We're Skeptics

"Anyone who believes that we aren't facing a climate crisis is either blind, ignorant, or doesn't care."

Another byproduct of our educational (indoctrination) system.

Wilbert Robichaud posted to metronews.ca

It seems to be more a trend of the planet. How many ice ages have there been? How many warming periods? Typically the people I see arguing about this are either ignorant on the subject, toting whatever Al Gore or that which other carbon interests have provided, as well as the scientists who may be endeavouring for career advancement, championed as saviours of our planet. It's completely reasonable to suggest that our activities are impacting the rate in which this occurs, but to say it's all us is crazy at best. The biggest issue faced is breathing quality and potential impact of pollutants in food and water. Jerry Teeple posted to metronews.ca

Tom Cruise stars in Oblivion, opening this weekend. HANDOUT

Hollywood's varied take on the end of the world

Movies. From serious to silly, an assortment of movies explore earth's final days

IN FOCUS
Richard Crouse
scene@metronews.ca

It seems 2013 is the year Hollywood took Stephen Hawking, the world's leading theoretical physicist, to heart. "The human race shouldn't have all its eggs in one basket, or on one planet," he says, suggesting that if we don't change our ways we "might end up like Venus, at 250 degrees centigrade and raining sulphuric acid."

No fewer than three upcoming movies portray the Earth meeting an untimely end.

After Earth sees Will and Jaden Smith star as a father and son who crash land on Earth after an alien war has left the planet dead and abandoned. A Seth Rogen comedy aptly titled This is the End sees a cast of young A-listers — like Jay Baruchel, James Franco, Paul Rudd and Emma Watson — at a Hollywood party when the world suddenly ends.

This weekend Tom Cruise brings us Oblivion, another story about a scorched Earth, which Cruise's character, a drone maintenance man, discovers the planet might not be completely abandoned.

It's the end of the world as we know it, at least according to Hawking and Hollywood, but it isn't the first time the world has ended, on screen anyway.

Coming a just half a dozen years after Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Five goes down in the almanac as the first sci-fi nuclear war film. It's set in a world destroyed by nuclear holocaust. The only five Americans to survive include a pregnant woman and her unborn baby, a neo-Nazi, an African-American man and a bank clerk. The story of subsistence and racial intolerance is an influential movie — Roger Corman and several others have borrowed the basic plot line — but its director, Arch Oboler, was a radio producer and the film is as visually interesting as you would guess a movie made by a sound engineer to be.

The Bed Sitting Room is a British take on Five, only with jokes instead of Oboler's earnest message. Starring Peter Cook and Dudley Moore, it's set in a post-nuclear-holocaust London following the Second World War. The war lasted only two minutes and 28 seconds before the bomb was dropped, leaving this strange group of survivors, including a civilian who is next in line for the throne, to explore their devastated city.

So far we've talked about serious and strange end of the world movies, but how about a silly one? That would be Savage Planet, an abandoned Earth movie that sees the planet taken over by giant killer space bears!

Boston's Wahlberg 'disgusted' over tragedy

Mark Wahlberg was in a sombre mood at the New York premiere of his new film, Pain and Gain — still grappling with the tragedy that struck his hometown in Boston.

Earlier Monday two bombs went off near the finish line at the Boston Marathon. Three people were killed and at least 140 were injured.

"I really didn't even want to come tonight. I hadn't really heard much — I spoke to my mom, and most of my family seems to be OK. It's such a big event, there's so many people there. It's horrible man. It's (expletive) disgusting, man. I just — I'm very upset," Wahlberg said Monday night.

"You try to put everything in God's hands and whatever happens here is out of our control and there's a bigger picture. But it's still obviously upsetting," the 41-year-old actor said on the red carpet before going into the premiere hosted by The Cinema Society.

New York rapper 50 Cent was a guest at the premiere and before going inside, he expressed his dismay. "Why is it even happening? But there's no explanation. We don't even know what happened (yet)," 50 Cent said.

Some 23,000 runners took part in the race, which attracts more than 500,000 spectators. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Amanda Seyfried misses her boobs

Not that there's anything wrong with them now, but Les Miserables star Amanda Seyfried says her breasts used to be bigger — and she laments not appreciating her ample bosom more when she was younger.

"I saw a picture of them a couple of days ago from when I was 19, and my boobs were way bigger. They were a D, and now they're a small C because I lost weight," she tells Allure magazine. "There was something so beautiful about the size of them. When I look back, I'm like, 'Why did I always give myself such a hard time?' Nobody gave me s— about it except me." But Seyfried admits that even at their current size, her breasts can be a problem. "They do get in the way a lot," she says. "Like I wear a really small, tight sports bra when I go running … because they want to smack my chin."

"Let's face it: It's probably not easy for her, by the way, to be living with her son," he admits. "It's life. And right now, two years after my father's death, this is where we are... But don't get me wrong. It's not without complications. It's not like I live in a compound and she's in the guesthouse. No. She's in the next room."

I used to share an apartment with a guy who was in the room over and I heard everything — and my roommate wasn't nearly as attractive as Bradley Cooper. Let's hope Mama Cooper is a little hard of hearing.

Jackie Robinson's Brooklyn

Historic tour. With the movie 42 in theatres, now is the time to traipse the legendary steps of the man who integrated baseball

With the movie 42 bringing the Jackie Robinson story to a new generation, fans young and old may be inspired to visit some of the places in Brooklyn connected to the African-American athlete who integrated Major League Baseball when he joined the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1947.

In Coney Island, a statue portrays Robinson and Pee Wee Reese, the white Dodger who stood by him in the face of racist taunts. At the cemetery on the border of Brooklyn and Queens where Robinson is buried, admirers still leave baseballs and other mementos. And for fans who enjoy irony — or who remain bitter about the Dodgers' departure to Los Angeles in 1957 — there's a "No Ball Playing" sign at the housing complex where the Dodgers' storied stadium, Ebbets Field, once stood.

Joseph Dorinson, author of Jackie Robinson: Race, Sports and the American Dream, says it's no accident that the colour barrier was broken by a Brooklyn team. "Jackie made it in Brooklyn, and no other place, because of the multicultural and ethnic diversity here," he said.

Here's a guide to exploring Jackie Robinson's Brooklyn.

Statue

The life-size statue in Coney Island shows Robinson and Reese arm in arm. It's inscribed with the story of how Reese, captain of the Dodgers, "stood by Jackie Robinson against prejudiced fans and fellow players ... silencing the taunts of the crowd" during a game in Cincinnati. The statue is located outside MCU Park, where the minor league Cyclones team plays, at Surf Avenue and West 17th Street, near the last stop on the D, F, N or Q train to Coney Island.

Home and church

Robinson lived in several places in Brooklyn before moving to Queens and later Connecticut with his wife and children. On a tidy block in East Flatbush, a two-story brick house at 5224 Tilden Ave. with a rusting fence and peeling paint bears a plaque that states: "The first African-American major league baseball player lived here from 1947 to 1949." There is an effort to landmark the house.

Robinson and his wife Rachel also lived for a time at 526 MacDonough St. in Bedford-Stuyvesant. Although much of the movie was filmed in the South, some scenes were shot on MacDonough because the filmmakers wanted to show the building's distinctive front stoop, a common feature of Brooklyn homes. The production company used the Nazarene Congregational Church at 506 MacDonough St. for storage and wardrobe while filming, according to Nazarene's pastor, the Rev. Conrad Tillard.

When Robinson first arrived in New York, he lived for a time with Nazarene's then-assistant pastor, the Rev. Lacy Covington and his wife Florence. "Church and faith were central to Jackie Robinson's success," said Tony Carnes, who publishes an online magazine called A Journey Through NYC Religions.

Nazarene was considered a "mink coat church" at the time, Tillard said, with an educated, affluent African-American congregation. Robinson later came back to the church to "make an impassioned speech about the dangers of drugs," Tillard said. Robinson's son, Jack, who'd served in the Vietnam War, was a heroin addict.

Gravesite

Robinson died in 1972, just a year after his son died in a car accident. They are buried, along with the Covingtons and Robinson's mother-in-law, in Cypress Hills Cemetery. "A life is not important except in the impact it has on other lives," reads the inscription on Robinson's tombstone. Mementos left by fans at the grave include a bat and baseballs, with one ball bearing a handwritten note thanking Robinson "for being an inspiration, strong and courageous."

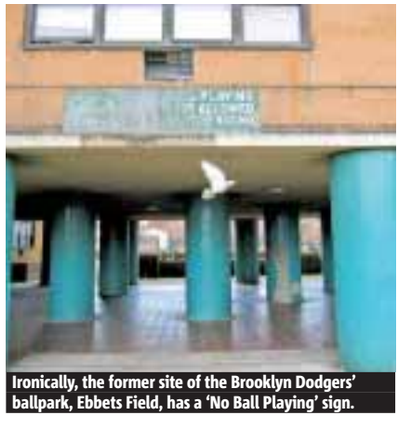
Jackie Robinson was close to the church's assistant pastor, the Rev. Lacy Covington of the Nazarene Congregational Church.



Ironically, the former site of the Brooklyn Dodgers' ballpark, Ebbets Field, has a 'No Ball Playing' sign.

Custard and pancake textures meet in refreshing berry-studded dessert

This pretty berry-studded dessert is a delicious cross between a custard and a pancake.

It makes a great entertaining option because you can pop it in the oven to bake while the main course is being served.

It also gets top marks as an arthritis fighter: it's low in saturated fat for a dessert, and includes raspberries, which are a great source of fibre, are high in antioxidants and have a low glycemic index

Ingredients

- 2 cups (500 ml) unsweetened frozen raspberries
- 1 1/2 cups (375 ml) liquid egg substitute
- 1 1/4 cups (300 ml) 2% milk
- 1 cup (250 ml) all-purpose flour
- 3/4 cup (175 ml) granulated sugar
- 3 tbsp (45 ml) melted non-hydrogenated margarine
- 1 tbsp (15 ml) vanilla extract
- 1/2 tsp (2 ml) salt
- Icing sugar (optional)
- Low fat vanilla yogurt (optional)

1. Preheat oven to 350 F (180 C).

2. Scatter raspberries in a greased, 11-inch (28 cm) shallow baking dish with fluted edges.

3. Combine eggs, milk, flour, sugar, margarine, vanilla and salt in a blender. Blend, on medium speed, scraping the pitcher once, for 30 seconds or until smooth. (Or, combine all ingredients in a bowl and whisk until smooth.)

4. Pour batter evenly over the raspberries. Bake for 40 minutes or until set.

5. Dust with icing sugar. Slice into wedges and serve warm with a dollop of yogurt.

The law of looking within

I've noticed that a lot of young people in university struggle with finding their right path in life. After all, there are so many doors that you can go through, so many careers and internships out there to try and pursue, and so many different paths that you can take on this exciting journey of young adulthood.

A year ago, due to a few unexpected, major life changes, I found myself in a strange and vulnerable position — for the first time in my life, I had absolutely no idea what I wanted to do after graduation.

My plans for law school fell through when I came to the realization that I would not be happy in a career that I found uncreative and boring. I was absolutely horrified by the thought that I no longer had a sense of direction in my life. After all, my entire undergraduate degree was planned for the purpose of attending law school.

I knew that it is impossible to navigate through life without a clear sense of direction because the tide will push you farther and farther off track from where you ultimately want to be.

Finally, after receiving some good advice but mostly conflicting opinions, I realized that the only way I could gain clarity was to rely solely on myself… and look within.

What I'm doing now

After I discovered what I truly wanted, and understood what I truly enjoyed doing, I decided to pursue a career in marketing and public relations.

I made a chart of my goals and created a step-by-step outline of the things that I needed to accomplish in order to actualize my goal. I decided to join a club on campus and run for a public relations position in order to gain relevant experience in the public relations field while still in university. I am now a member of AIESEC where I have the chance to gain real world experience while finishing my last semester of university. AIESEC is one of the world's largest student-run organizations that excels in bridging the gap between the classroom and the workplace. As a public relations coordinator in AIESEC, I have the opportunity to connect with media companies on a frequent basis, and have already developed a clear understanding and appreciation of the public relations field. I can proudly say that after several months of confusion and uncertainty, I am now gaining valuable experience that is in complete alignment with my goal.

It is the outcomes of your actions, not the actions themselves, that will make going into work each day fulfilling. ISTOCK

I've had several friends approach me saying that they are struggling with their job searches.

Their skills and experience, and in turn, their resumés, lack focus; they're casting a very wide job search net in every field from marketing to PR to graphic design to finance.

I believe that as much as their skills or experience lack focus, their passion, drive, desire or 'why' also lacks that focuses — and employers notice.

If we started thinking less about what day-to-day tasks we wanted to do while at work (the 'what') and reflected more on the things we wanted to achieve, accomplish or bring about (the 'why'), we'd have a much easier time determining which field/industry we want to enter, companies we'd like to work for and jobs we'd like to apply for.

Before applying for my current position, I'm not certain I would tell you that I'd like to answer countless phone calls, write an annual report, manage the development of creative materials or tweet all day.

What I did know, however, was that I wanted to help kids. I wanted to give all kids the opportunity to play sports and I wanted to help families in need. This isn't just why I wanted a job; these were a few of the principles I want to centre my entire life around.

When you go about your job search you should seek to answer the following questions:

- Why do I want to work?
- Why do I want to wake up in the morning?
- What do I want to accomplish?
- What drives me?

Your answer might be: to help others, to become famous, to make money, to help others make money, to find a cure, to make your community green.

No answer is right or wrong; what matters is determining what is significant to you. The more intrinsic your 'why' the better.

If these questions are driving your job search and your career is centred on the answers to these questions, you will be far more successful then someone who says, "I want to crunch numbers," "I want to write press releases" or "I want to draw blueprints."

Why do you want to crunch numbers, write press releases or draw blueprints? Those actions in and of themselves will likely not give you much personal satisfaction. Instead, these daily, job-related tasks should be a means to accomplishing your greater career goal.

Does a leader lie in you? Do your research and reel in the magnetism. ISTOCK

Much of my educational background focuses on the study of leadership and it is a course that I teach in the Department of Liberal Studies at Humber College in Toronto.

As an elective, students sign up for various reasons; some say they want to become better leaders and some just didn't want to take the elective on vampires that was offered instead. Regardless of intention, they are there and we have the opportunity to explore different concepts related to leadership.

On the first day of the course, I explain to my students that I can't teach them "leadership" — it's not something that is taught. However, it is something that can be learned. My role is to facilitate an environment where they can take the leadership concepts that we discuss and apply them to their context, regardless of their industry or the program that they are enrolled in.

We have a discussion about who we identify as leaders, and in each class that I have taught the leaders that are mentioned are positional, political and celebrities.

Through personal and professional development, my goal over the course is for my students to view themselves as leaders and consider the impact that they have and can have. This can occur both inside and outside the classroom through:

- Reading books about leadership
- Having discussions about current events that may be impacting the world or even a piece of your own world
- Watching TED talks, reading biographies and viewing documentaries
- Creating your own story on how you want to make an impact.

Whether it is formally or informally, lifelong learning suggests that we all continue to be shaped by those who are around us and perhaps the most influential is learning from our personal experiences by making meaning out of them.

Consider your paradigms and what experiences have influenced the way that you perceive our world. Take courses outside of your program and industry to experience new processes that can then be used and applied within your own field.

Whether you are in school or have just graduated, electives, week-long intensive courses and workshops can allow you to do so. Approaching situations with an interdisciplinary point of view will not only enrich your contributions, but also your own perspective. It's up to you as to which experiences and situations you'll choose to engage in.

Bombings prompt security questions

Russian officials gave mixed signals on Tuesday over whether they need to increase security at key sporting events such as the World Athletics Championship and the 2014 Winter Olympics after explosions at the Boston Marathon killed three people and wounded more than 170.

The track-and-field championship, which takes place in Moscow Aug. 10 to 18, is seen as a dress rehearsal for the 2014 Olympic games in the Black Sea resort of Sochi.

One senior sports official said security was being beefed up but others said Russia's take on Olympic security was already very robust.

Caps beat Leafs for 8th straight win

Alex Ovechkin scored his NHL-leading 28th goal, and the Washington Capitals enjoyed a rare feeling of dominance outside their division Tuesday night, winning their eighth straight with a 5-1 victory over the Toronto Maple Leafs.

Jack Hillen, Martin Erat, Troy Brouwer and Marcus Johansson also scored, and Braden Holtby made 29 saves for the Southeast Division-leading Capitals.

The Capitals have moved into playoff position by feasting on the weak Southeast, going 14-3 within the division, but they entered Tuesday's game just 9-14-2 against the rest of the Eastern Conference. All but two of those nine wins were by one goal.

Curling. Participants at Players' Championship out to knock national champs off their perch

As national champions, Ryan Fry knows the opposition will be gunning to beat his Northern Ontario rink at this week's Players' Championship.

He teamed with skip Brad Jacobs, second E.J. Harnden and lead Ryan Harnden to win their first Tim Hortons Brier last month and they followed it up with a silver medal at the world championship. They're well-rested now after a whirlwind month and will be one of the favourites at this week's season-ending Players' Championship in Toronto.

Fry said the Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.-based teammates were overwhelmed by the local support and love from curling fans across the country during their recent run in the spotlight. He added they also learned a lot from the experience.

"You've got to check your egos a little bit more, which I think we all learned how to do," he said after a practice session on Tuesday. "You just learn how little of a margin for error there is to competing against teams that want something as badly as you do."

The Canadians dropped an 8-6 decision to Sweden's Niklas Edin in the championship game in Victoria. It's always tough to settle for silver, but Fry is confident his rink can use it as a building block for the future.

"In a lot of the cash tournaments we play, you're not getting the best games out of everyone all the time," he said. "But when you go to a world championship and you see the desire these guys have just to beat Canada, it's motivating for me just to be able to know that you have to be at that high of a level to give yourselves a shot to ultimately be the best team in the world for a year." Trestman wastes no time at first Bears mini-camp

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Everything moved faster for Jay Cutler and the Chicago Bears offence on Tuesday at mini-camp practice — including the new coach.

The new, up-tempo offence came complete with Marc Trestman running all over the field, up and down the sidelines, to get his point across to players in a high-energy style the Bears aren't used to seeing from their head coach.

"That's just how I have been doing it," said Trestman, who came to the Bears from the CFL's Montreal Alouettes after the firing of Lovie Smith. "I like football and like moving around and making sure people are running to the ball, and that is kind of how I have done it."

Cutler liked the new approach.

"It was faster," he said. "We were in and out of the huddle. I think we wanted to try to create as game-like an atmosphere as possible."

The changes included shorter drops by Cutler to throw, the ball getting out quicker and less complicated pass routes. It's just the opposite of the passing game the Bears used over the past three years, and Cutler seemed to like it. It could mean fewer sacks for a quarterback among the most harried in the NFL the last three seasons.

"We're going to protect the quarterback and get rid of the ball as fast as we can," Cutler said. "We want to get the ball to the playmakers. That's where we're going to make our money, getting them the ball fast and letting them make plays for us."

Autopilot acceleration. Why accelerating feels so good ...

AUTO PILOT
Mike Goetz
drive@metronews.ca

The sensation of acceleration is a joyful thing we get from cars. OK, some cars.

Because there are definitely a few that are just not into acceleration in any meaningful way. Consider this exchange from the movie, Horrible Bosses, when the police grill Nick Hendricks:

"You wanna explain why you were doin' 61 in a 25 zone … One block from the victim's house, just moments after he got shot dead?"

"I was drag racing. I'm a drag racer."

"You were drag racing? In a Prius?"

"I don't win a lot."

Whether you do it within or outside of the law, fast acceleration in a car never fails to bring us a jolt of pleasure. It's a similar sensation to a roller coaster ride, skiing, cycling fast down a hill, even sky-diving. Other pleasurable sensations — like listening to good music or savouring good food — are equally complex, but at least it's obvious how they get processed, by ears and taste buds and such.

How does acceleration get noticed by our minds and bodies, and why do we like it when it does?

The Internet people have answers for these questions. I will try to summarize.

Apparently, somewhere deep inside our ears are things called "otoliths." We have two in each ear, one for detecting acceleration in the horizontal plane, and one for detecting acceleration in the vertical plane.

Each otolith consists of a hard bone-like plate attached to a mat of sensory fibres. When our head accelerates, the plate shifts to one side, bending the sensory fibres. Gravity can also tug and shift the plates, bending the sensory fibres as well. This is how the brain gets the signal that the head is either accelerating or falling/rising or both. It's quite good at figuring out the difference, and if nothing is too extreme, we don't even know that it's processing all this information.

But when something changes up fast, or is unexpected and extreme, the brain suddenly becomes uber engaged. This intense mental activity can be frightening but also exciting. We like it.

This ramped-up state is also about an increased focus to help keep us alive during the potentially life-ending moments suggested by all this sudden acceleration. I guess that's why we evolved to have otoliths in the first place — self-preservation.

In addition to all this brain activity, our bodies are trying to reconcile forces that are just plain weird. When you are accelerating in a car, the car seat is essentially pushing you forward, but at the same time you're getting all this push back from the world — driving you back into the seat. It's the crazy nature of how we experience acceleration — from the opposite direction of the actual force accelerating you. In this way, the "skin" is another body organ that senses acceleration, particularly the portion around your butt cheeks.

All good clean fun.

One final safety tip: Though many sources cite "kinesthesioception" as the official term for our ability to sense acceleration, it is still not an acceptable Scrabble world.

Car care will protect hard-earned investment

The harsh winter weather can take its toll on your vehicle. NEWS CANADA

As Canadians put away their snow blowers, hats and gloves, there is no better time to protect their vehicle, which for most people is their second largest investment. The harsh winter weather can take its toll, so proper cleaning and maintenance are key to staying on the road and not in the repair shop.

To help prepare for those spring showers and changing road conditions, here are simple tips drivers should perform to keep their vehicles running efficiently this road trip season:

Change in temperature means change in inflation. Proper tire inflation is essential for increased automotive safety, optimum driving performance and significant cost savings, including better fuel efficiency. Tires should be inflated to the vehicle manufacturer recommendations printed on the vehicle door placard or in the glove box and should be checked monthly. Improper inflation can lead to premature or irregular tire wear, and underinflation reduces a vehicle's fuel efficiency by an average of 3.3 per cent.

Breathe free. You may be deeply breathing in that fresh spring air, but your car could still be choking on the salt, dust and sand it sucked in over the winter. Replacing your air filter improves air flow to the engine and increases engine performance and fuel efficiency, especially during warmer months.
